Ironically, if he is placed on the ballot, it will probably end up costing him the election. I'm not saying there is any chance of this ever happening. I'm just saying, wouldn't it be ironic if Jimmy Carter were to actually cost Clinton the election? There are quite a few articles already out there discussing whether this will help or hurt Carter. It's hard to say. As we've seen before, candidates that are put on the ballot get two things out of it: a free ride of sorts and the media attention. It's hard to say if he can benefit or harm his campaign. He'll probably get votes from conservatives by putting his name on the ballot. He might get a few swing voters as well, but he is running as a Republican in a Democratic state, so he won't win a majority of Democratic votes. If I were in his camp, I'd be trying to get his name on the ballot. He will definitely receive a free ride and the media attention (if he gets elected he might be featured on "60 Minutes" or even the Daily Show). It would be great for his public profile if he were elected. Getting a book deal while in the White House would be something to see. But if he loses the
